

Abstract: A hitherto unknown contemporary manuscript of Hugh of Saint-Victor's work De tribus diebus from Siegburg. Comments on the early distribution of Victorine theology between Paris, the Rhineland and South Eastern Germany

This brief contribution presents an unknown fragment of Hugh of Saint-Victor's work De tribus diebus, the opening folium from perhaps the oldest extant copy of this early tract written and illuminated ca. 1130 in the famous abbey of Siegburg (Rhineland). The verification of the variants of the text shows that this manuscript not only belongs to the earliest transmission of this work, but is obviously the missing link between Paris and a group of early copies from Bavaria, Austria and Franconia, and thus has the potential to challenge the most recent reconstruction of the early history of the work for which it was not used at that time.
